Course description and aims

It cannot be repeated too often: nothing is more fertile in wondrous effects than the art of being free, but nothing is harder than freedom's apprenticeship.

—Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America

This course will explore issues surrounding the concept and practice of political freedom. We will begin with an examination of traditional philosophical approaches to this issue—such as debates about free will and determinism, agency and structure, and negative and positive liberty—but we will primarily focus on how these traditional rubrics obscure our understanding of the particularity of political freedom. In order to better grasp this particularity we will explore diverse theoretical, literary, and social scientific works.

Course mechanics

This is an upper division lecture course, but time will be allotted for classroom discussion. Students should come to class prepared to engage in lively conversation based on the week's reading. In addition to bringing the pertinent texts to class, students will be asked to write short (1 page) reader responses. The reader responses should avoid summary, and instead critically engage a particular question or theme raised by the readings. Responses will be turned in at the beginning of each Tuesday class and counted as a part of the final participation grade (25% of the total). Students must also attend and actively participate in weekly sections. In addition to these short writing assignments and section participation, students will be asked to complete three 5-6 page papers. A list of paper topics will be distributed in class at least one week before each paper is due. All papers must include direct citation and notes (details provided with the topic handouts). The papers will each be worth 25% of the final grade. Students will be given a mid-semester evaluation of their work. There is no final exam.
